The background image shows a chef in a white uniform, with their hands visible as they work. In the foreground, there is a white plate featuring a delicatessen dish, possibly a terrine or a stack of meat, garnished with green herbs and small dark olives. A hand is seen placing a garnish on the dish. To the right, a bowl of red sauce or tomatoes is partially visible. The overall scene is a professional kitchen setting.

The Tomino cheese was invented in the area of Cuneo, in Piedmont, about 100 years ago.

The Tomino 'Mangia Piemontese' is produced following the traditional recipe: the milk, which has to rest one day, is pasteurized in an autoclave at 68 ° for about 20 minutes, then is cooled to about 27 °. Lactic ferments and rennet are added (10g per 100kg). After a night rest the curd is extracted. The milk, now dense, is poured into moulds where it remains for one night, in a drying room at about 24 ° with 60% Humidity. The next morning the mixture salted and dried about 5/6 hours long. At this point the cheese is covered with red wine vinegar (except tomino balsamic vinegar) so that it reaches its typical colour and the right degree of acidity. The main feature is in fact its burnished colour and its sour taste given by the live lactic acid bacteria. Last but not least, the Tomino cheese is immersed in sunflower oil with spices such as nutmeg, dehydrated parsley and herbs, in order to obtain a delicate taste. The final result is unique and due to the traditional non-standardized processes the consistency of Tomino cheese might surprise the palate every time.
